Orientation Programme & Bridge Course
BA/BBA LLB(5yrs) /LLB (3yrs)

Students entering Higher Education (HE) are coming into a new and unfamiliar environment, and many do not yet know what it means to be a University/HE student. With increasingly large class sizes, it may not be possible for a professor to tailor material to a diverse audience, where everyone has their own prior experiences of learning and their own assumptions about what it means to be a student in Higher Education. But it might be possible for professors to consider ways of inducting students into programmes by:

- providing information on respective roles of students and teaching staff
- clarifying misconceptions about these roles or expectations
- providing information on who staff are and where their offices are located.
- helping to create an environment where students are encouraged to disclose their needs and seek appropriate support.
- advising on different approaches to teaching and learning
- supporting students in learning to learn
- helping students to acquire the basic concepts of the discipline.
- encouraging students to test out and experiment with strategies for learning.

It could help staff during the induction period to find out what students' conceptions and experiences of learning are. It could also help to know what their conceptions about the discipline are. Devising activities to draw out this information early in the course could be time well spent. However, induction into a subject is not something that happens in the first few days at college. As the programme of study develops, students may benefit from the ongoing attention of teaching staff to the above list of considerations, as students engage with different subjects within the programme and with different activities within one subject. Students who are well inducted into the process of maximizing their participation in lectures may need new and different induction into the different learning environment of a placement.

Clear pre-entry information on how learning and teaching will be organised can help students to develop new strategies for tackling the range of tasks appropriate for different methods. The induction period can provide useful opportunities for all students to test out their existing strategies, some of which are likely to need refinement in some teaching settings. By attending to the above list of ways of inducting students, many students, including those with impairments, are likely to be helped into the new environment of teaching.

An induction process which clarifies for all students the relative responsibilities of teacher and student, which creates an atmosphere of open experimentation where all students can be open about what they see as barriers to their learning, and which begins the work of helping students to develop effective learning strategies, is likely to go far towards helping all students.

Considering all these, SDM Law College proposes orientation Program and Bridge Course for students admitted to first year of BA/BBA, LL.B./LLB/LLM.
